Significantly improved conditions are expected around midweek, although low-pressure areas over North Europe will approach our regions. Wednesday promises bright sunshine once more, before a further weak cold front will try to push away the early summer warmth on Thursday. However, it will not succeed, as a further low-pressure area over West to South-West Europe will settle in until the weekend, and on its front warm subtropical air masses will inflow our regions. The weekend promises a mix of sunshine and clouds and a southerly föhn wind particularly in the mountains. Starting next week, this southerly airflow will slowly get under the influence of a low-pressure area, whereby the amounts of clouds will increase, and first showers will begin to interfere with the weather.
